One of the most exciting—though by no means uncontroversial—academic developments in church history during the past century has been the renaissance of interest in early Christian biblical scholarship. This lecture will sketch the origins of modern interest in this topic, identify leading trends in research today, and discuss some of the most promising prospects for future research.

Peter Martens specializes in the exegetical cultures that emerged around the Christian Bible in late antiquity. He is the author of Origen and Scripture (Oxford University Press, 2012) and is currently completing an edition and translation of Adrian’s Introduction to the Divine Scriptures (Oxford University Press).
